patients treated by primary radiotherapy (RT). We retrospectively analyzed 519 patients with a total of 616 oropharynx carcinomas who were treated by RT between 2003 and 2008. Of the 616 patients, 482 (78.5%) tumors were HPV positive, whereas 142 (21.5%) tumors were HPV negative. Five-year local tumor control (TLC) rate was significantly worse for HPV positive tumors (91.7%) than for HPV negative tumors (93.3%) ($p=0.003$). In addition, five-year tumor-related (TTR) survival was significantly worse for HPV positive tumors (71.0%) than for HPV negative tumors (81.7%) ($p=0.002$). No significant differences were seen for overall survival (OS). In contrast to primary surgery (without or with postoperative RT), primary RT does not lead to more TLC for HPV positive tumors than for HPV negative tumors. However, in the clinical context of primary RT, TTR was significantly worse for HPV positive tumors. This shows that HPV positive tumors respond less well to primary RT than HPV negative tumors. Therefore, HPV status of primary tumor should be considered in the treatment concept of patients treated by primary RT.
